Basic Electronics Mv Rao Pdf Free Download.Q: Remotely executing a bash script over ssh I'm using a debian server to run a bash script every week as follows: 0 * * * * /usr/bin/sh /home/script.sh The script does nothing on its own, but simply performs some bash commands that I execute to establish a database connection, which takes a few minutes to complete, then I am returned to the terminal. Now, I'm thinking of upgrading that server to CentOS 7, and as I understand from this post: Scalability and high-performance of bash scripts? I should really use a daemon: So, how can I still have this script run remotely through SSH? I've been through the SSH docs, and it seems that I could run the script that way, but I'm not sure. A: You could start a shell in the background with & And when you're finished, kill it A: Use the nohup command to prevent the shell from closing when the script exits. From the nohup manual page: If there is a job file associated with the shell, it is run in the same environment as the shell. It will allow for scripts to exit normally and not to affect the command running in the background. A: To add to Thierry's answer, you can use nohup script.sh & in bash. The nohup is almost always preferable to starting a daemon from a bash script. From bash manual: When a command is started with the nohup command, the shell does not attempt to read commands from the current file. 3da54e8ca3
