Homeschooling is the practice of educating children at home, either in a parental home or in the classroom of a private tutor or other. The practice of homeschooling arose in the late 19th century with the advent of the Internet and the rise of the information society. Before the Internet, homeschoolers had to go to public schools, often in the country. History The practice of homeschooling is as old as education itself.

The ancient Egyptian pyramids were designed to train scribes for the state. The ancient Greeks used the pupil-teacher model that continues today. For more than 30 centuries, education in the Catholic Church was done largely in the home. The practice of homeschooling gained widespread popularity in the late 19th century. One of the earliest was Samuel H. Perkins, a. The American Journal of the Medical Sciences, a periodical devoted to the advancement of medical knowledge, in 1895 commented: The general custom of sending the children to school has no doubt borne a large share in crippling the physical manhood and mental vigor of our people. Education in the home has been held in too low regard. The occupation of the home is to be preferred; educational work in the home is just as respectable and useful as educational work at public schools. The practice of home-schooling in the United States is closely related to the political agendas of the time. One of the major advocates of early homeschooling was Rose Wilder Lane. In January 1941, the U. S. government and a private company, the Ideal Cement Corporation, called upon Rose Wilder to serve as expert consultant.

At that time, the State Department was concerned with the establishment of American military forces in the conquered lands of Europe. It was also concerned that American citizens would be re-educated in the ways of subjection to American rule after the war. Lane decided to use her scholarship of Western civilization to help her country deal with its social, cultural, and political problems. She believed that the government schools were being filled with Nazi sympathizers. Lane recommended the establishment of home-schooling. In 1943 she published her book, From Housewife to Heretic. The book became very popular and was sold in the millions.

Some people had serious concerns about its academic credibility. In 1949, a nationwide survey was done of 1,200 homeschooled and 1,200 government schooled children. In the survey, it was found that homes
