

MAKEESMANICREVER REPRESENT: The 3D-file format doesn't support indexing or is there a way to work-around? If you have two arrays that are independently sorted in O(1) time and are similar, then they are still considered equivalent. So, it's just an automatic side effect of how the file format works. Also, two sorted arrays which are stored contiguously in memory, without an intervening gap, are also considered equivalent. So, it's just an automatic side effect of how the file format works. Crowded cage culture - adopting the adult foster-care model. Crowding in the prison environment is a problem for psychiatric inpatients. We sought to find out whether crowding and the associated distress could be reduced by the adoption of an adult foster-care model (the adult foster-care approach). Fifty adult psychiatric inpatients were observed over a 6-month period. They were assessed with the Clinical Interview Schedule-Revised and a psychosocial assessment carried out during and after crowding at the prison. The use of the approach reduced overcrowding and appeared to reduce the psychiatric morbidity of all of the patients. The proposed adult foster-care approach could be adopted as a practical, community-based means of reducing crowding and consequently, the psychiatric morbidity of people detained under the Mental Health Act 1983.Q: Echo order from MySQL data I have a table with a column called "location" I have a function in PHP which reads the contents of this table and outputs them as: $results = array(); while ($row = mysql_fetch_array($query)) { $location = $row['location']; $results[] = $location; } If I use print_r($results), I get: Array ( [0] => [1] => [2] => [3] => [4] => [5] => ) However I need to echo the results in the order they were read from the database - so how can I do this? A: If you want to echo $results in an arbitrary order, rather than echo each value as it is read, you can use usort() to put each value into the order you want. It works like this: // your code as is
