What, exactly, is in a professor's email? Thursday Apr 30, 2013 at 12:01 AM A professor's email is so important that federal laws require the University of Massachusetts to preserve it. Brian J. MahoneyTribune Staff A professor's email is so important that federal laws require the University of Massachusetts to preserve it. Even though some professors, such as the College of Arts and Sciences' Robert Fineberg, are able to access the electronic messages with the click of a mouse button, it's still troubling to think what may lie in those emails that they don't see or what could be stored in their archives on backup disks that go missing or are accidentally erased. Faced with such a dilemma, the UMass Amherst Library started a pilot program at the university last year to digitize letters sent to and received from some select faculty members from June through September 2010. The university is in the early stages of developing a full-fledged program that will include not only emails to and from faculty but also electronic versions of syllabi, books, paper medical school transcripts and more. The pilot program that began in fall 2011 is not intended to replace the paper archives that are central to faculty members' duties, said William T. Woods, vice president of the UMass Libraries. The electronic documents, however, are stored in a system that is not connected to university libraries or computers, and so can be accessed only via secured university servers in the Harvard-affiliated Center for Teaching and Learning. In the university's pilot program, "we can basically see in real time how many new letters are being received on email or via fax or other method," Woods said. "Then we try to figure out whether we should send that person an email or whether we should simply print it out." Given that some of the information in the emails is sensitive and classified or in the process of being filed, Woods said, "We were concerned that we had not only get privacy issues, but we also didn't want someone copying it, so we put in controls," involving both
