s. There is nothing but darkness to the east and west, and occasional bits of light from the fort and smaller encampments. I see about a dozen others, but when I call out, there is no response. I wait a good time, and then call again. Again, silence. I can barely see my hand in front of my face, so I know the sun is coming up. I am certain there will be trouble finding water. And food. "Shit." I murmur, "Shit, shit, shit." The entire group has followed me up to this point, and the last of them are now off of the trail with me. There are no tools, no shovels, no food, nothing. The only thing we have left to rely on are our wits and the patience to outlast the day. I have lost my watch. I see a rock ledge to the west, and in the faint light, I see a lake about a quarter of a mile ahead. At least we can get some water. We can wait a bit longer and make our way there. Once we get there, we'll be able to pass the time by making talk. As we head towards the lake, the people that came behind me ask for directions. "Sorry. No time for directions, and I doubt you'll understand my travels. I'll just show you." I tell them, while keeping my back to them. I am not really sure what I am supposed to do. They will see the ledge, but I have no idea where it leads to. I tell them to continue west, and that we'll head straight for the lake. As soon as they get to it, they'll know where they are. After I lay down my plan, I lead them to the lake. There are four of them, and when I reach the edge of the lake, I look down. I can barely see my hand in front of my face, and I struggle for a bit to get my footing. Then, I start to get up. The next moment, I am on my back, looking up at the moon. There is a bruise the size of a grapefruit on my forehead. i s p r o b o f s
