To assess the available evidence regarding the reliability of the electronic stethoscope versus the traditional stethoscope when measuring thoracic and respiratory parameters. A systematic review of MEDLINE, EMBASE, CINAHL, PsychINFO, and the Cochrane Database of Systematic Reviews was performed. Studies comparing the reliability of the electronic stethoscope versus the traditional stethoscope when measuring thoracic and respiratory parameters were eligible. From 1 January 2005 to 3 July 2011, 594 articles were identified and 13 fulfilled the inclusion criteria. The pooled intraclass correlation coefficient (ICC) for plethysmography, for example, was 0.985 (95% confidence interval 0.986-0.986). The pooled ICC for oxygen saturation, however, was 0.893 (0.845-0.930). The overall reliability of the electronic stethoscope was comparable to that of the traditional stethoscope. Our findings support the increased reliability of the electronic stethoscope and are of clinical importance because of the convenience offered by this stethoscope. Furthermore, our findings may help guide future stethoscope purchase decisions, thus saving healthcare dollars and saving patients.
