Advancements in merchandising and technology, a new marketing campaign featuring catchy jingles, and operational improvements have helped the chain become a bigger player than it was five years ago. "The CSA execution and marketing has been excellent," said Doug Andrews, co-founder of retail consultancy Coresight Research. "They've continued to do what they've been doing." After opening a new $50 million distribution center in West Point, Ga., two weeks ago, CSA is preparing to launch CSA Ideas, a pilot program that will allow shoppers to make

Ultimate CAD.NEW YORK — Even as the U.S. Navy’s aircraft carriers batter North Korean ballistic missiles with impunity, several submarines have been abandoned to rusting hulks. That is the conclusion to which the American intelligence community has come: North Korea is racing to field a fleet of ballistic missiles that can reach parts of the U.S. mainland. By 2017, U.S. intelligence officials say, Pyongyang will have a submarine-launched ballistic missile capable of hitting the U.S. territory of Guam, and a new-generation missile with the range to reach parts of Alaska. And they predict that within the decade, North Korea will have a submarine-launched, intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) that could strike the continental U.S. While the tip of the North’s missile-development program is now years away, the design is not. This week, the Pentagon unveiled a simulated video of the next-generation submarine-launched missile being fired by a North Korean attack submarine. (See videos of North Korea’s solid-fuel missiles in action.) As it did with its long-range intercontinental ballistic missile in July, U.S. intelligence agencies are essentially “shooting in the dark” as they try to assess the nature and development of North Korea’s missile programs. “We don’t have a complete set of facts,” one U.S. official told Global Security. The National Security Agency and other U.S. intelligence agencies have “virtually zero” information on the program’s existence, the official said. “We’re looking, and you’re looking, at the very beginning of it,” the official said. The U.S. assessment of a North Korean submarine-launched ballistic missile program dates back to the 1990s. In 2009, North Korea tested a second-generation submarine-launched ballistic missile — the one that shattered a Japanese peace project in the form of a large water tank — and said that it had already successfully tested a submarine-launched ballistic missile 6d1f23a050
